Many Valuable Elements Found in Ocean Waters

The oceans of the earth contain, in addition to fish and sea weed, enough salt to provide 20,000,000 tons for each human being alive today.

Moreover, they contain smaller amounts of other important chemicals, such as Epsom salts, gypsum, potash, and limestone.

There are also many valuable substances, including gold, silver, sodium, and bromine.

Until a few years ago, very little had been done to exploit this vast source of chemical wealth.

The cost of evaporating 97 per cent of water was more than the product were worth.

However, during the past three years an American chemical company has been extracting bromine from sea water at the rate of $3.00 a year (worth several million dollars).

Bromine is a dark brown liquid of low boiling point, noted for its spalling odor and its corrosive action on iron.

It is present in sea water as one of its compounds, sodium bromide, a colorless, soluble crystalline compound resembling ordinary salt.
